Panel Discussion: Centering Racial Equity in ACEs and Other Upstream Strategies

ACEs is going upstream in Michigan. Many Michigan organizations, communities and schools have done amazing work to address and help prevent ACEs. This exceptional panel of experts will share their “real-world” experiences and demonstrate how systems and organizations can move beyond their norm to create change while addressing the structural drivers of health through an equity lens.

You will learn how health systems such as Henry Ford Health System and BSHS System (formerly Spectrum Health) and organizations such as the YMCA have moved the needle toward upstream prevention of ACEs with innovative programs and services—and inspire you to do the same!

Introduction of Presenting Partner Video and Update: Supporting Data-Driven Strategies to Prevent ACEs in Michigan

Significant infrastructure to collect statewide data from youth about ACEs and Positive Childhood Experiences (PCEs) has been put in place recently. In this session, Dr. Edick will share how these data are being leveraged to drive implementation of community-specific ACE prevention strategies in several communities across Michigan.

Mat Edick, PhD, Director, Center for Strategic Health Partnerships at Michigan Public Health Institute, Okemos, MI

General Session: School Violence—Is there a relationship with ACEs?

Over the past years there have been many instances of gun violence (real and threats) taking place in schools across the country—too many to enumerate here in this space. Schools now routinely practice lock down measures and protocols and put in place other safety measures. Sadly, Michigan has not been immune to these episodes with the most recent being Oxford Schools where four students were tragically killed. Everyone wants to have an end to this violence, but how do we get there?

This session will explore if there is a relationship between violence and Adverse Childhood Experiences (ACEs), as well as where efforts to increase awareness and establish interventions make sense and ultimately make a difference. Our panelists will share their perspectives and engage the audience in a thoughtful exchange of ideas and recommendations.
